sociology faced a frustrating paradox. Classic work on mental illness stigma and labeling theory reinforced that the “mark” of mental illness created prejudice and discrimination for individuals and family members. Yet that foundation, coupled with deinstitutionalization of mental health care, produced contradictory

The global spending on mental illness is high with countries such as USA having to spend about 2.5 of their GDP on caring for mental illness. Despite this, few countries have a concrete mental care plan which can help them in reducing this cost. Mental illness leads to a reduction on the quality of life among those affected (Germov, 2005).
